In an age of rapid change where the fundamentals of business, economics and politics are evolving in real-time, we are just now recognizing that disruption can mean permanently tossing old ways for uncharted fast-moving new pathways. This panel will identify the political and economic trends that investors, developers and service providers should consider based on a curated cocktail of ingredients such as millennial driven demographics, technology, social media, economic indicators, new legislation, financing tools for sustainability, infrastructure and housing...and good old politics. It's a look around the digital corner to help attendees visualize the political and economic leverage points often lost in the fast-paced shuffle of real and fake news.
