Now that Californians have spoken and Proposition 51 has passed, many are wondering what that will mean for the facilities at their local schools. Many districts, in concert, passed local measures to help remedy the years of deferred maintenance and to transition schools to 21st century learning environments. But what impact will the new administration have on education planning and spending? What impacts will shifting pedagogies have on the built environment?

This panel discussion you won't want to miss! Moderated by Jeff Vincent, Deputy Director of the Center for Cities+Schools, UC Berkeley, which aims to position high-quality education as essential to creating equitable, healthy and sustainable cities for all. He will lead our panel of leaders in education in a thought-provoking discussion on the future of learning environments.
